

Character Opposites Roleplays

One of you has just recruited a new member of staff but they are the opposite of what was needed. The other person should criticise them for picking that person, giving all the reasons why they weren't suitable.

Two people have applied for jobs in your company. There are good and bad things about each person. One of you thinks that overall one is better and the other person thinks the other is better. Take turns saying how your person is good and the other person is bad. When you run out of ideas, try to agree on who actually would be best.

Talk about who would be the best and worst romantic matches for someone (imaginary) who you both know, talking about things like compatibility ("opposites attract" or not, etc) and previous failed relationships. You should mainly talk about personality, but you can also talk about looks etc.

Reminisce about people who you both knew at junior high school (fellow students, teachers, etc). You both remember their personalities differently, so discuss why you describe them the way you do, including sometimes describing them in ways which are the complete opposite of how your partner describes them.

-----cut-----

Character opposites roleplays

One of you has just recruited a new member of staff but they are the opposite of what was needed. The other person should criticise them for picking that person, giving all the reasons why they weren't suitable.

Two people have applied for jobs in your company. There are good and bad things about each person. One of you thinks that overall one is better and the other person thinks the other is better. Take turns saying how your person is good and the other person is bad. When you run out of ideas, try to agree on who actually would be best.

Talk about who would be the best and worst romantic matches for someone (imaginary) who you both know, talking about things like compatibility ("opposites attract" or not, etc) and previous failed relationships. You should mainly talk about personality, but you can also talk about looks etc.

Reminisce about people who you both knew at junior high school (fellow students, teachers, etc). You both remember their personalities differently, so discuss why you describe them the way you do, including sometimes describing them in ways which are the complete opposite of how your partner describes them.